When I joined a weekend gardening group, I expected someone to tell me exactly what to do. On my first morning, however, the organiser, Jo, simply asked what I wanted to learn. I said I knew nothing about growing food. She gave me a small patch of ground and suggested starting with beans.

For the next month, I watered my plants whenever the surface looked dry. They grew slowly, and I began to think that gardening wasn't for me. Then another member, Ravi, showed me that the soil underneath was still wet. I had been giving the plants too much water.

Ravi didn't take over my patch. Instead, he showed me how to check the soil with a finger. Soon the plants looked healthier. When I finally picked my first beans, there weren't enough for a whole meal, but I took a photo anyway.

I still ask plenty of questions. Now, though, I understand why Jo didn't give me a long list of instructions. Making a small mistake, and getting help to understand it, taught me more than following a list would have done.

- 57 What is the main point of the narrator's experience?
- A) Growing food is usually cheaper than buying it.
- B) Beginners learn best when they work entirely alone.
- C) Understanding a mistake can be an important part of learning.
- D) Written instructions are essential for every new activity.
- 58 Why were the plants growing slowly?
- A) They were getting too much water.
- B) They were not getting enough water.
- C) The narrator had planted them too late.
- D) Ravi had moved them to another place.
- 59 What does "take over my patch" mean in this text?
- A) Make the area larger
- B) Choose a different crop
- C) Move the plants indoors
- D) Do the gardening there instead of the narrator
- 60 Why does the narrator mention taking a photo of the beans?
- A) To show that the group required a record of every meal
- B) To show that even a small result felt like an achievement
- C) To explain how Ravi identified the problem with the plants
- D) To explain why the beans could not be used for cooking

For three months, a small customer service company replaced its usual morning meeting with a written update. Staff posted what they were working on and identified anything that required help. The manager hoped to recover some of the time that meetings consumed without weakening cooperation.

At first, the change appeared successful. Most employees said that they could begin concentrated work earlier, and the updates created a searchable record of decisions. Several people who rarely spoke in meetings contributed detailed suggestions in writing. However, after a few weeks, some newer employees reported that they were spending longer deciding whom to ask for help. They could read what colleagues were doing but had fewer opportunities to discover what those colleagues knew.

The company responded by introducing two short, optional question sessions each week. It also asked experienced staff to add a sentence explaining the reason behind any unfamiliar procedure mentioned in an update. The amount of written material increased slightly, but repeated questions became less common.

At the end of the trial, the manager resisted describing the change as a simple victory for written communication. The company had not measured whether customers received better service, and the trial had taken place during a relatively quiet period. Still, staff wanted to keep the new arrangement.

The experience suggests that replacing meetings is not just a matter of transferring the same information to a different channel. Meetings may perform several functions at once, including functions nobody notices until they disappear. A useful redesign begins by identifying those functions, rather than assuming that the most visible one is the only one that matters.

- 61 What was the manager's main purpose in introducing written updates?
- A) To save time while maintaining cooperation
 - B) To reduce the number of people working in each team
 - C) To make employees compete over their productivity
 - D) To give customers direct access to internal decisions

- 62 Which benefit was observed during the trial?
- A) Customers began answering their own questions.
 - B) New employees needed no further explanations.
 - C) Staff stopped having disagreements about procedures.
 - D) Some quieter employees contributed more ideas.

- 63 What difficulty did newer employees experience?

- A) They could not find a record of earlier decisions.
- B) They had less opportunity to identify colleagues' expertise.
- C) They were required to attend too many question sessions.
- D) They were unable to read the written updates.

- 64 Which statement best reflects the writer's conclusion?

- A) Written updates are preferable whenever staff request them.
- B) Optional meetings prevent a fair assessment of communication.
- C) Communication changes should account for several functions and be evaluated cautiously.
- D) Quiet periods provide enough evidence to predict performance under pressure.

TEXT 5

When the town council invited residents to propose improvements to a public square, it described the exercise as an opportunity to start with a blank page. This was a generous phrase, though not an entirely accurate one. The budget had already been fixed, maintenance vehicles needed access, and a contract required the existing lighting to remain. None of these constraints was unreasonable. What was questionable was allowing participants to discover them only after becoming attached to their proposals.

The first workshop produced ambitious designs, followed by predictable disappointment. Some residents concluded that the council had never intended to listen. Officials, meanwhile, felt unfairly accused: they had genuinely hoped to receive useful ideas. Both reactions were understandable, but neither addressed the design of the consultation itself.

For the second workshop, the organisers placed a large map at the entrance, marking what could change, what could change only at additional cost, and what was fixed. Attendance was lower, yet the discussion was more specific. Participants disagreed sharply about seating and shade, but they could explain which trade-offs they preferred. One proposal, initially dismissed as impractical, was revised into a cheaper version and eventually adopted.

It would be convenient to conclude that transparency automatically creates trust. It does not. Stating a limit can reveal that the available choice is smaller than people consider acceptable. Nor does publishing constraints excuse authorities from explaining why those constraints exist. A boundary presented as technical may still reflect a decision that ought to be open to challenge.

The more modest lesson is that participation needs an honest account of its reach. Inviting people to influence a decision while concealing where influence ends risks turning enthusiasm into evidence against the process. A useful consultation need not promise that every proposal can succeed. It should enable participants to distinguish between an idea rejected on its merits and an idea that was never eligible for consideration. Without that distinction, even a sincerely offered invitation can sound, afterwards, like a performance.

SORULAR 65 - 68

35 dakika / bölümün tamamı

Text 5 için önceki sayfadaki metni kullanın. Her soruda tek doğru seçenek vardır.

- 65 Why does the writer question the phrase “a blank page”?
- A) It suggests residents should submit drawings rather than discuss ideas.
 - B) It implies the council has no experience of organising consultations.
 - C) It understates the amount of work required to maintain the square.
 - D) It suggests a freedom of choice that existing constraints did not allow.
- 66 What made the second workshop more productive?
- A) Participants reached agreement on every important issue.
 - B) The council removed the restrictions on the project.
 - C) Participants could assess proposals against visible limits.
 - D) More residents attended and offered a wider range of ideas.
- 67 Why does the writer mention boundaries presented as “technical”?
- A) To show that apparently practical limits may contain contestable decisions
 - B) To argue that residents generally lack the knowledge needed to participate
 - C) To suggest that maintenance requirements should always override preferences
 - D) To show that publishing technical details necessarily resolves disagreement
- 68 What does “like a performance” suggest in the final sentence?
- A) A consultation may entertain residents despite producing few proposals.
 - B) A consultation may appear staged even when the invitation was sincere.
 - C) A consultation should be judged mainly by the quality of its presentation.
 - D) A consultation becomes effective when officials rehearse their explanations.

TEXT 6

At the opening of our neighbourhood's repaired footbridge, the speeches dwelt on speed. The project, we were told, had been completed in fourteen weeks. This was true in the carefully delimited sense that fourteen weeks had passed between the arrival of the builders and the removal of the barriers. The years during which residents had requested a repair belonged, apparently, to another clock.

It is tempting to dismiss this as ordinary publicity, and perhaps that would be fair. An opening ceremony is not an audit. Yet the choice of when a story begins does more than flatter the people telling it. It determines which forms of effort become visible. In this version, the bridge emerged from a decisive intervention; the patient work of reporting damage, gathering signatures and attending meetings was merely the weather in which the intervention occurred.

A neighbour suggested adding a plaque thanking the campaigners. I liked the proposal, although I doubted that a longer list of names would resolve the problem. Recognition can be extended while the underlying account remains intact: the public asks, the institution acts, and gratitude flows in the expected direction. What disappears is the possibility that repeatedly having to ask was itself part of the failure.

This does not mean that the engineers deserve less credit. Their achievement is no smaller because it sits within a less comfortable story. Indeed, treating criticism of the process as criticism of the repair makes it unnecessarily difficult to appreciate either accurately. We should be able to admire the bridge and still inquire why its necessity took so long to become an official fact.

The bridge is now busy, which is the strongest argument for having repaired it and no answer at all to the question of delay. People crossing with shopping bags are not obliged to carry a history lesson as well. Institutions, however, have a different responsibility. If they measure success only from the moment they authorise action, they may learn to become impressively efficient at solving problems they have spent years declining to recognise.

Perhaps the next opening speech could give two dates: when work began, and when the need was first accepted as credible by those who lived with it. The resulting story would be less tidy. It might also make the next repair happen sooner, which seems a more useful tribute to this one than another adjective about speed.

SORULAR 69 - 72

35 dakika / bölümün tamamı

Text 6 için önceki sayfadaki metni kullanın. Her soruda tek doğru seçenek vardır.

- 69 What is the writer's central objection to the official account?
- A) It exaggerates the quality of the engineering work completed.
 - B) Its chosen starting point excludes effort and delay relevant to judging success.
 - C) It gives residents more responsibility for the repair than they deserve.
 - D) Its emphasis on speed implies that the bridge may be unsafe.
- 70 What is the effect of describing residents' efforts as "merely the weather"?
- A) It exposes how the official story reduces active contributions to background conditions.
 - B) It suggests that unpredictable conditions made the campaign difficult to organise.
 - C) It acknowledges that residents' contributions were too varied to describe precisely.
 - D) It indicates that the campaign's effect depended primarily on favourable circumstances.
- 71 Why does the writer doubt that a plaque would resolve the problem?
- A) The campaigners would probably disagree about whose names should appear.
 - B) A public expression of gratitude would weaken appreciation of the engineers.
 - C) Giving credit need not challenge an account that obscures institutional failure.
 - D) The repair's present usefulness makes further recognition unnecessary.
- 72 What is implied by the proposal to include two dates in future speeches?
- A) Ceremonies should become complete factual records of public projects.
 - B) Residents should accept responsibility for delays before construction begins.
 - C) Institutions should avoid praising speed because it has little practical value.
 - D) Broader accounts of elapsed time could encourage earlier institutional responses.

- 93 How should the reviewer's initial praise of the book's detail be understood?
- A) It acknowledges the reconstruction while questioning its explanatory value.
 - B) It suggests that accurate description compensates for the book's other weaknesses.
 - C) It conceals a belief that the meetings themselves were inaccurately reported.
 - D) It endorses the author's decision to give every meeting equal attention.
- 94 Why does the reviewer question the book's conclusion about compromise?
- A) It gives too little attention to differences in participants' personalities.
 - B) It treats concessions with very different consequences as though they were equivalent.
 - C) It assumes that successful projects can avoid disagreement altogether.
 - D) It suggests that participants should refuse to change their original preferences.
- 95 What makes the episode involving the volunteer a valuable exception?
- A) The author resolves the dispute by deciding which participant was right.
 - B) The author avoids making a judgement until all uncertainty disappears.
 - C) The author's confession establishes her authority over the other participants.
 - D) New information changes the author's interpretation, and that revision remains visible.
- 96 What does the reviewer ultimately want from the narrator?
- A) Confidence strong enough to produce a single consistent explanation
 - B) Neutrality that prevents her from judging participants' actions
 - C) Judgements that can be revised in response to what she learns
 - D) Personal admissions that replace analysis of the project's decisions
